BY ANTHONY GIORDINA | DIRECTED BY DOUG HUGHES | JANUARY 29 - MARCH 6, 2016
A Georgetown hostess opens her home for political foes to lay down arms and raise a glass. When her son’s formidable wife arrives, the parlor pleasantries of D.C.’s past descend into a fight that could implode the family in this “smart, literate and funny” (New York Times) new play.

ALL THE WAY
BY ROBERT SCHENKKAN | DIRECTED BY KYLE DONNELLY | APRIL 1 – MAY 8, 2016
It’s not personal, it’s politics. With the country still reeling from President Kennedy’s assassination, and a rising tide of bitterness over Civil Rights, it will take more than politicking to hold America together. Jack Willis returns to the role he originated in this “sure-fire, action-packed hit” (Huffington Post), winner of the 2014 Tony Award for Best Play.

Amir has achieved the American Dream — but has he removed himself too far from his roots to keep it? Don’t miss this daring Pulitzer prize-winning play that is “terrific, turbulent, with fresh currents of dramatic electricity.” (New York Times)
What a joy to bring back two artists who have had a long history with Arena Stage — Cheryl L. West and Charles Randolph-Wright. Cheryl is one of our most produced playwrights from Pullman Porter Blues to Jar the Floor. Charles is both a writer and director, with productions including Ruined, Love in Afghanistan and Guys and Dolls. From both comes Akeelah and the Bee — a world-premiere co-production with the excellent Children's Theatre Company in Minneapolis, led by Peter Brosius.

Producing new work is a core value for Arena. Playwrights are our seminal creators. First there is the word, then there is the image and then the interpretation of the word. I know how difficult it is to work as a playwright who is not receiving the support they need to write the stories that need to be told. This is why I am a passionate leader in the field of new play development.

Arena Stage is not only a theater — we are a center. We celebrate the theatrical bounty of the nation through our four-pillar approach to programming, with a rigorous focus on the production, presentation, development and study of American theater. In addition, we strive to bring distinctive regional voices into the season, both through our own productions and through collaborations with strong theaters like Children's Theatre Company.

Arena is, in many ways, a writer's theater — our focus is on American plays, American voices and American artists. One of the most powerful voices comes from our youth. The Voices of Now program creates positive change within our communities by engaging in dialogue centered on young people's experiences of their world. Through that program, we are able to connect and learn from the youth in D.C. This holiday season we have two productions that feature young voices with both Akeelah and Oliver! It's a great moment to celebrate the future of the American theater through young people on the rise.

Washington, D.C. is filled with “Akeelahs.” Children throughout our city are told that they cannot succeed, but it takes the entire community to rally together to change those preconceptions. I know our audiences will witness more than a story about the challenges faced by Akeelah, and see it as a call to action to each of us.

Best,

Molly Smith, Artistic Director
You may be wondering how someone of Akeelah’s age would access Arena Stage shows and programs. Akeelah wouldn’t have to spell “scherenschnitte” because she would be able to see even our largest productions through programs we provide.

Pay Your Age is exactly what it suggests — age determines the ticket price for our patrons age 30 and under. We also offer a host of other savings programs for our Southwest neighbors; the men and women who serve, or have served, our country; and other community and student groups. We believe in great theater at a great price, and offer savings and education programs for our patrons, but moreover we offer relevant theater on issues that resonate with every member of our community and beyond.

We have also created the Voices of Now program that trains ensembles of middle-school, high-school and adult artists to devise plays using autobiographical stories that challenge social standards and ask questions that are relevant to the artists and their communities. Our team has traveled far and wide, including to India, Peru and, recently, Croatia, in order to create positive change within their communities by opening up a dialogue.

Anita Maynard-Losh, our Director of Community Engagement, shared with the members of our staff and myself a lesson from the young ensemble in Croatia: “understanding is not agreeing.”

Those young artists are living in a country divided after war, but they enlightened our team about issues occurring right here on our soil — the conflicts and injustices of wealth, race, equality and education throughout the United States. Our team was able to bring back a valuable, relevant and universal lesson that we were then able to relay back to you. Through these great Community Engagement programs led by a wonderful team, Arena is able to create and produce work like Akeelah and the Bee that opens the lines of communication about issues we can all witness and experience.

It has always been a part of Arena’s mission to make theater accessible to the entire community-at-large, but we strive to extend further. We make it our mission to listen to the community around us (and even across the world) and create theater that reflects what we all experience. We do not have to forgo an opportunity to see great theater because we cannot afford it, just like we do not have to attend the National Spelling Bee to understand the struggles that Akeelah faces.

Thanks for r-e-a-d-i-n-g!

DIRECTOR’S NOTE

I knew nothing about Akeelah and the Bee when I went to see the film, except that I had friends in it. I expected great performances from them, but I was unprepared for the unique, powerful, entertaining and truly life-changing experience the film was for me.

I am descended from a long line of educators. When I first attended school, my mother told me to make an A or an F, that there was no average in our family. Average simply was not good enough. I was very fortunate because my family, and especially my mother, gave me permission to dream, and to dream big. That was quite a task for a young kid from rural South Carolina, but I believed them.

Akeelah is given a similar task of following her dreams, which unfortunately means following your fears. How does one do that? How do you allow belief and passion to replace fear? Our country has become so polarized that I worry our kids thwart their dreams for far too many reasons. But then I walk into the rehearsal room of Akeelah and the Bee and I am instantly reminded of its power. I watch these young actors — black, Asian, Latino and white — take this amazing journey together. How extraordinary to experience such a stunning depiction of our world on stage.

Cheryl L. West has taken Doug Atchison's amazing film and has transformed it into an amazing play. I am so very proud when I realize that people (and not just young audiences) will watch *Akeelah and hopefully be moved and inspired to make a difference. At such a depressing time in our country where it seems no one is listening to each other, Akeelah steps up to the microphone and through spelling forces us to realize that we have far more in common than we have that is dissimilar. And what better place to tell this story than in our nation’s capital, at my home Arena Stage. I am thrilled to bring this play to the audiences here that I love so much, and I feel blessed to collaborate with the genius of Cheryl. I dedicate this to the memory of my greatest teacher, my mother, and to all the teachers out there. What you do truly changes the world.

Thank you.

Charles Randolph-Wright, Director
