With Sweat, Lynn Nottage brings us the reality of America’s working class dealing with a shocking change to their livelihood and a community responding to a new radical way of living. In the midst of a national conversation about unions and their function in our country, her play explodes with vitality and power. It’s an important conversation to have as we consider new leaders for our country and particularly for our audience here in D.C., America’s most political city.

Arena produced Lynn’s award-winning Ruined in 2011, and Lynn has been a participant in Arena’s resident playwright program, specifically on this co-commission with the Oregon Shakespeare Festival on the development of Sweat. Lynn worked closely with long-time collaborator and director Kate Whoriskey, interviewing residents of the Reading, Pennsylvania area to understand their stories in a deep way.

It’s a pleasure to work again with our colleagues at the Oregon Shakespeare Festival, led by Artistic Director Bill Rauch. I have known Bill for over 30 years — while he was traveling to communities with Cornerstone Theater Company, I was creating theater with different communities in Alaska through Perseverance Theater. Somehow, we’ve always been on a similar wavelength and I have a deep respect for his passion as an artist.

Some long-time Arena fans may remember his production of A Community Carol at Arena back in the 1993/94 season. OSF has a long history and reputation of great work and premieres, including Equivocation by Bill Cain (a presentation in Arena’s 2011/12 season) and All the Way by Robert Schenkkan (coming up this spring, in an Arena production directed by Kyle Donnelly).

Our city of Washington is built on political ground in every way. Politics are not just the main source of jobs but they drive our city, our conversations, our lives. This is a brilliant new play which will inform debates all over the city and remind audiences of those who have been forgotten.

Best,

Molly Smith, Artistic Director
As the son of a union organizer I learned first-hand from my mother about the important role organized labor plays in the functioning of our economy and society, and have always appreciated the respectful way our resident theater movement deals with the unions and associations we engage on behalf of the artists we employ. This regard is not limited to my approach to theater, but rather has been ingrained in Arena Stage from its inception. Thomas Fichandler, our founding executive director, was engaged in discussions of unionizing from an early age, evidenced by Employment and Wages in the United States, which he co-authored.

Tom brought that same reverence for organizing to the theater, ensuring that our artists are cared for and supported. He also saw the importance that theaters themselves band together. As a founding member of the League of Resident Theaters (LORT), Tom not only facilitated connecting resident theaters across the United States but also implemented collective bargaining in order to ensure economic fairness and prosperity.

Today, LORT is the largest professional theater association of its kind in the United States, with 71 member theaters spanning the country. By bargaining collectively with the Actors’ Equity Association, The Stage Directors and Choreographers Society, the American Federation of Musicians and United Scenic Artists, LORT ensures a uniformity and quality of standards within its practicing theaters. This not only benefits union members, but the theaters themselves as it enables productions to more easily transition from nonprofit to commercial theaters without penalizing those involved.

Embracing a system of unions benefits both employees and employers; the production you are about to enjoy would not have been possible without several of the unions mentioned above, nor could it have transferred from the Oregon Shakespeare Festival to Arena in its original form. We are indebted to the men and women who are represented within these unions, as they hold us accountable to our commitment to fairness and prosperity. This production confronts us with the history of unions within our country, as well as physically reminding us of their importance to this art form. I welcome each of you to reflect on the instrumental nature of the union within both your everyday life and our society at large.

Thanks for listening.

Best,

Edgar Dobie, Executive Producer

“I know it’s not a new story, but I feel like it is very much the narrative of today.”
— Lynn Nottage

Lynn Nottage's latest play takes a searing look at the de-industrial revolution in a struggling town.

Sweat, a co-commission between Oregon Shakespeare Festival's American Revolutions: The United States History Cycle and Arena Stage, got its start with a late-night email from Lynn Nottage’s close friend, a single mother of two.

“She said she was completely broke; she was having a very difficult time making ends meet and had reached a level of desperation,” Nottage recounts. Her friend wasn’t asking for a handout, but said she wanted her close friends to understand her circumstances. “I just need some guidance. I need a shoulder to lean on just because I’m going through a very, very hard time.”

The email broke Nottage’s heart. “I’d known this woman extremely well, and I had no idea the depths of her despair. She lives two doors down from me, and it made me realize that probably most of us are living two to three doors away from someone who is either in poverty or on the verge of poverty, and that’s the nature of the culture we’re living in right now.”

The Occupy Wall Street movement was just beginning. “We had no sense of what this was. All we knew was that there were these people in Zuccotti Park sitting there and saying, ‘99 percent of us are suffering while the 1 percent are continuing to get richer and richer.’ So my friend said, ‘Let's go over there.’"

The two walked in circles and chanted. Later, her friend said, “I actually feel a little better. Nothing has happened, but I feel better to know that at least there is a voice to what I’m feeling, and I’m not by myself.”
